

Table of contents

Acknowledgements	v
Table of figures, images, maps, and tables	xi
Acronyms and abbreviations	xiii
Chapter 1
Labour in global industries	1
1.1 Starting and staying with labour – a scientific and political project	3
1.2 The point of departure: Women workers in the Cambodian garment sector	6
1.3 Book outline	9
Chapter 2
Towards a feminist labour geography of global (re)production networks	15
2.1 Introduction	15
2.2 The global (re)production network approach	16
2.3 Towards a feminist labour geography	29
2.4 Labour agency as gendered multiple-scalar processes	39
2.5 Conclusion	49
Chapter 3
Cambodian women in the global garment (re)production network	51
3.1 Introduction	51
3.2 From rural areas to the city – creating translocal life realities	53
3.3 Women workers’ vertical integration into the garments GRPN	62
3.4 Women workers’ horizontal embeddedness into the garments GRPN	74
3.5 Conclusion	81

Chapter 4
Working with women workers. A (facilitated) feminist (participatory) action research approach	85
4.1 Introduction	85
4.2 The epistemological grounding of this project and the issue of positionality and representation	89
4.3 Action research	96
4.4 Feminist participatory action research	105
4.5 A broader transdisciplinary framework	108
4.6 Research questions and sampling	112
4.7 Building access – the master’s thesis as a preparatory phase	117
4.8 Getting to know the women workers in the Cambodian garment sector: The first phase of data collection	120
4.9 Taking action: The second phase of data collection	123
4.10 Conclusion	126
Chapter 5
Becoming a woman, becoming a worker. Life stories of Cambodian garment workers	129
5.1 Introduction	129
5.2 Experiencing the working class	135
5.3 Everyday struggles of social reproduction	144
5.3.1 Struggles for care	145
5.3.2 Towards a broader understanding of social reproduction	160
5.4 Conclusion	178
Chapter 6
The Cambodian garment workers’ general strike of 2013/2014 and the post-strike developments	183
6.1 Introduction	183
6.2 Women workers’ views from below on the general strike of 2013/2014	187

6.2.1 Women workers and their everyday places and spaces of (re)production	187
6.2.2 Trade unions and their formal networks	194
6.3 Post-strike developments	198
6.3.1 Higher wages do not mean more money	199
6.3.2 It's about living and reproducing	204
6.3.3 The issue of gender-based violence	216
6.3.4 The politicization of labour and shrinking spaces	220
6.4 Conclusion	225
 Chapter 7
Transnational labour solidarity. A bottom-up approach to (self-)networking and organizing labour in the garments GRPN	229
7.1 Introduction	229
7.2 Transnational labour solidarity or (self-)networking and organizing labour in the global garment industry	233
7.3 Barriers to (self-)networking and organizing along the chain	241
7.3.1 Mental barriers	243
7.3.2 Structural barriers	252
7.4 (Self-)networking and organizing via processes of social reproduction	256
7.4.1 Action – establishing real contact between garment workers and truck drivers	258
7.4.2 Existing in a dialectic totality – potentials and problems of (self-)networking and organizing labour along the production chain via the next-node approach	273
7.4.3 The need to generate concrete strategies together	283
7.5 Conclusion	285

Chapter 8
A feminist labour geography of global (re)production networks	289
8.1 Introduction	289
8.2 Considering the capitalist totality and the gendered spatial reality of production and social reproduction processes	292
8.3 Identifying workers as subjects of (re)production	294
8.4 Conceptualizing social reproduction as a potential for labour agency	297
8.5 Tapping into the potential of social reproduction in transnational practices of labour solidarity	298
8.6 Limitations and implications for further research	300
8.7 Concluding remarks	302
References	305
Appendices	327